Many hobbyists start with a high-resolution photograph—often a classic portrait of Jesus—then spend minutes trying to trace or mask it within a raster editor. This “manual tracing” approach usually leads to three recurring issues: Loss of clarity: each extra pixel adjustment blurs the original detail, making the final icon look muddy on mobile screens. Inconsistent style: without a defined vector library, the same series of images can drift in line weight, color palette, and overall mood. Time sink: a single clipart piece can consume 30–45 minutes, a pace that clashes with tight sermon prep schedules. Switching to a vector-first workflow eliminates most of the friction.
