the financial stress that often forces families to choose between income and essential caregiving. This broader safety net supports workforce stability, especially in industries where short-term staffing gaps can disrupt operations. To qualify, workers must have earned at least $2,500 in covered wages over the past 12 months. Once eligible, they can receive 55 % of their average weekly wage—capped at the state-set maximum—up to 12 weeks per year. The benefit is funded through a modest payroll contribution shared by employees and employers. Employees can claim leave for a single qualifying event or split it across multiple events within the same year, providing flexibility for complex family situations. For example, a parent could take six weeks for a newborn's birth and another six weeks later to care for a sick relative, all under the same annual entitlement. Gather documentation. Collect recent pay stubs, proof of employment, and medical or adoption records that substantiate the qualifying event.
