The Chinese calendar has a long and fascinating history, with roots dating back to the Shang Dynasty (16th-11th centuries BCE). The calendar is based on a combination of lunar and solar cycles, with each month beginning on the new moon. The Chinese calendar is also closely tied to the concept of yin and yang, which represents the harmony and interdependence of opposites. This philosophy is reflected in the calendar's use of dualistic concepts, such as the opposition of yin and yang, and the cycle of the five. The 12-year animal cycle is a central component of the Chinese calendar, with each animal associated with specific traits and characteristics. For example, individuals born in the year of the dragon are said to be confident, passionate, and charismatic, while those born in the year of the rabbit are known for their sensitivity, compassion, and creativity. The animal cycle can provide valuable insights into personality, relationships, and even career choices. While the provided data does not contain
