shared their favorite calendar tricks with the university community. One popular method involves using separate calendars for different aspects of life, such as work, school, and personal activities. This helps avoid conflicts and ensures that everything runs smoothly. Another time-saving tip is to schedule breaks and self-care activities into the calendar, acknowledging that taking care of one's mental and physical health is just as important as meeting deadlines. Some KSU students swear by color-coding different categories in their calendars to facilitate quick identification and organization. This approach can also be used to visualize deadlines and appointments by categorizing them based on priority or type. "I use different colors to distinguish between school assignments, work projects, and personal appointments," said a student. "This makes it easier to spot any overlapping commitments and avoid double bookings." While having a reliable calendar is crucial, it's equally important to avoid over-scheduling. KSU students advise against booking too many activities at once, as this can lead to increased stress and decreased productivity. "It's essential to leave some buffer time between commitments to allow for flexibility and adjustments," said a student. "This will help prevent feelings of burnout and maintain a healthy work-life balance."
